"Spite Corner"
Amusing Small-Town Comedy
By CHARLES DARNTON

YEN Frank Craven couldn't be expected to write a second "First Year," yet with "Spite Corner" he still holds good as our leading Main Street playwright. His sense of character, as well as his humor, makes the little piece at the Little Theatre amusing small-town comedy.

You come away from this village play feeling as though you had called on the neighbors. The best of them are Mister Gooch and Miss Coolidge—that is to say, they're the best talkers. If Miss Coolidge hasn't married from choice it's nobody's business that it was men's choice. You have a sneaking notion that the men must have been bigger fools than the general run of the breed to let her jog along in single harness till she's fifty if she's a day. But bless her heart, she doesn't seem to mind. She just brings her driving over to Elizabeth Dean's dressmaking shop and enjoys herself quietly passing along word that the summer boarders down the street are called summer complaints—she will have her little joke-book—and that old man Lattimer came by his stroke because he was so full of bad temper it backed up on him. Yet she's such a kindly soul she can't refuse to tell Elizabeth's fortune with cards and turn up "a dark lady" who is going to make trouble.

As for Mister Gooch, his time is his own and he can spend it as he likes, but of hanging around with nothing particular to do, but keeping his hands and ears open and standing by when old Lattimer and the other trouble-makers select their friends to force her to sell her corner home so they can put up a block of smart stores that will make the town look like something. So far interest goes it doesn't matter much that the Deans and Lattimers have been enemies for generations, but that Elizabeth has waited five years for young Lattimer to marry. This plot is like so much humor, finally destroyed by a fire that leaves Elizabeth snug and happy in young Lattimer's arms. It might be better to have the romance end in smoke and excitement instead of dragging it into an additional scene, especially as charred timbers make a most effective setting for comedy.

But there are many little human touches that keep the play warm. The talk in the shop with the rise of the curtain is a delight to hear, the rummaging through a trunkful of keepsakes stirs memories, and an auction sale suggests a curious mixture of humor and pathos. Meanwhile all the simple characters seem absolutely real. This is particularly true of Mister Gooch as embodied by Percy Pollock. He has a humor all his own and is so good that you give him first place without a second thought. At the same time Marie L. Day, who plays Miss Coolidge, is just as lifelike and almost as amusing. A broadly funny characterization is given by Mattie Keane as a wealthy matron who leaves no doubt that she knows what she is talking about when she gets on the subject of marriage. Stephen Maley makes the shabby old skiffint a convincing figure. Madge Kennedy plays Elizabeth simply and has a genuinely appealing moment.

SCOTS LIKE "BARLEY BREE."

Visitors Have Faith in Medicinal Virtues of Beer.

(From the London Chronicle.)

The Scottish people have never outgrown the old beliefs in the medicinal virtue of John Barleycorn. Some people blame Burns for keeping the drink popular which derives its technical name from the Gaelic "bairne," meaning water. Whether due to the influence of Burns or some occult force far deeper in the recesses of the race, the affection for the Scottish peasant for "the barley brie" is a sociological phenomenon. A patriot will even invite his friend to join him in a wee drop of the said hick.
